

Britain can now flourish as a global player like never before!

Britain has a natural advantage in English speaking countries, and with our ties around the world in migration, trade and culture, it makes no sense to be locked into a European customs union.

Since the referendum, many world leaders have extended their hands to the United Kingdom. In the United States, speaker of the house Paul Ryan said: "We need to emphasise that they [the British] are our indispensable ally, we have a special relationship, and I think that does mean we should have a trade agreement with Great Britain".

The Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand have announced that they will work together to make new trading arrangements with the UK post-Brexit, and former Australian Prime Minister Tony Abbott was quick to congratulate Britain on voting to restore its independence.

The main advantage of leaving the EU will be the restoration of Britain's seat on the World Trade Organisation. It is incredible, that as the fifth largest economy in the world, we currently have no seat on this global body because of our EU membership. This can now change, and Britain's global influence will be able to grow.

The Commonwealth will play an important role in Britain's post-Brexit global position. Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Ghana have already voice a desire to sign trade agreements with Britain. Global growth forecasts for the Commonwealth greatly outstrip those of the Eurozone, which has stagnated under the conditions because of the crisis in the single currency zone. Rising economic giants such as India offer unlimited opportunities for UK business, both in terms of export markets and import destinations.

Now is the time for Britain to go global. Unleashed from the shackles of a declining European customs union, and its increasingly burdensome regulations, Britain can flourish as a global player like never before!
